Monterey Institute’s Development Project Management Institute
Announces Winter Dates and 10/31 Registration Deadline

Monterey Institute of International Studies’ Development Project Management Institute (DPMI) will hold a three-week training program in Monterey this January 4 through January 22. Interested professionals are encouraged to register for the program by October 31 and the program is open to the public.

DPMI combines guided individual readings, three weeks of intensive classroom instruction, and strategy software instruction and application. The training, organized as three separate modules, is closely linked to the United Nations Millennium Development Goals, a driving force in the development field. The program uses a cross-sectoral approach, taking best practices from the development field and combining these tools with successful concepts drawn from the private sector.

DPMI instructors include the Institute’s program director, Dr. Beryl Levinger, and fellow development practitioners Evan Bloom, co-founder of Root Change, and Claudia Liebler, a consultant for USAID, Peace Corps, and an array of international development organizations. In total, DPMI instructors have over 100 years of experience working on development projects in over 50 countries.

Past participants in DPMI training programs include local non-governmental leaders, graduate students, development practitioners, career-changers and those interested in expanding their professional skill-set in the areas of strategy development and facilitation.
